Hand-crank shaking machines originate from the 1880s, and had many names and equally many patents, as they were very popular. Curfew's hand-crank countertop shaker is a Coles Shaker, initially used at apothecaries, and later in bar saloons, where dairy drinks containing milk, cream and eggs were mixed and shaken. The Coles Shaker can shake two drinks at the same time, which is very nifty during busy hours.

The Coles Shaker is a rare piece to find nowadays, since the industrial revolution has made hand-crank machines obsolete, but we have been lucky to find two machines to adorn the bar counter at Curfew. Get your own unique bar saloon experience, and order 2 Ramos gin fizzes!

Ramos Gin Fizz

The drink, which combines gin, citrus, simple syrup, egg white, heavy cream, orange flower water and club soda, is a panoply of flavors and textures. The gin—most recipes call for London dry, but Ramos himself used Old Tom, as was fashionable in his time—provides a sturdy base for the cocktail, while the sugar and citrus add their trademark sweet-tart balance. Heavy cream lends richness, the egg white bulks up the mouthfeel, and the orange flower water provides a floral note. Finally, sparkling water lightens the drink, adding a touch of effervescence. Then, of course, there's the shaking. The story goes that Ramos employed a chain of "shaker men" in his bar to meet the constant demand from locals and tourists, who had become enamored with the labor-intensive cocktail. Supposedly, each drink was shaken for between 12 and 15 minutes, which we can all agree is a lot of minutes. But don't let that fun fact discourage you. Foamy, fresh, floral and delicious, the Ramos Gin Fizz is worth rolling up your sleeves for—and today, most bartenders shake their Fizzes in under a minute.
